The British Library provides access to the internet on certain conditions. We expect everyone to read and accept these guidelines before they begin to search or view material. We may monitor usage.

1. You may not use the internet for:
  - a) The creation and/or transmission of any offensive, obscene or indecent images, data or other material
  - b) The creation and/or transmission of material which is likely to cause annoyance, inconvenience or needless anxiety
  - c) The transmission of material such that this infringes the copyright of another person or organisation.
2. When you use the British Library network to access another network, any abuse of the acceptable use policies of that network will be regarded as unacceptable use of the Library's own network.
3. You may not use the internet for deliberate activities with any of the following characteristics:
  - a) Corrupting or destroying other users' data; or otherwise disrupting their work
  - b) Violating the privacy of other users.
4. Using the internet gives access to information provided by other organisations, over whose content and availability the British Library has no control. The British Library does not assume liability for content made available by third parties.
